

The History of Women in Europe, 1870_Present

This course will be a chronological and thematic survey of the history of women and gender in Europe since 1870. On the one hand, it will explore the changing context of women's lives over the course of the 20th century, and how women negotiated the choices and constraints they were faced with. We will examine both the everyday reality for women of different social classes and races, and their participation in the broader social and political movements that defined the 20th century. In a century that witnessed dramatic changes in women's roles, we will look at these changes but also at the more subtle continuities. In order to frame a history of European women in this period, women's historians have long argued that it is important to both understand the household life that many women defined themselves through, and to recognize the often-hard-to-see roles they played in public life as well as the connections between these "private" and "public" lives. These connections will be made by asking how normative concepts of masculine and feminine--ie, gender-- affected broader historical processes, events and public policies.

The following texts for the course have been ordered through Groundworks:

Lives and Voices: Sources in European Women's History, Lisa DiCaprio and Merry Wiesner
Becoming Visible: Women in European History, Third Edition, eds. Claudia Koonz, Renate Bridenthal

All other readings are contained in a supplementary packet, which is available for purchase through www.universityreaders.com.

There are two different options for course assignments. The first option consists of a midterm and a final, as well as a short, 5_7 page essay. All assignments must be completed to receive a final grade.

The second option is for those students who enroll in a discussion section. There are two sections, both on Thursdays, from 9:30-10:20 and from 2:00 to 2:50. Enrolling in a section is OPTIONAL, but attendance is mandatory once enrolled. Those who enroll will have section participation count as part of their grade in place of the midterm. Their two written assignments will be the final exam and the paper. Sign-up for sections is "first come, first serve."
